

Favorite Hobby YouTube

Here's a revised version:

My favorite hobby is spending time on YouTube. It's an instant way to feel entertained and happy, especially whenever I'm feeling stressed or don't want to focus on anything too productive. When I have some free time, I simply start my computer, open YouTube, and immerse myself there for a while.

YouTube is a fantastic platform because it has billions of videos across various topics. It's a valuable source of educational content, entertainment, and even income opportunities. That's why I prefer to spend my time on YouTube. Sometimes, I watch comedy shows, or I search for new movies available there. I also enjoy watching sports highlights, especially for cricket, which is my favorite sport. I love to stay updated on cricket highlights and news.

Another thing I enjoy is listening to music on YouTube. The platform has an extensive music collection, so I often play songs in the background while working on other tasks on my computer. This way, I can enjoy music while staying productive.

I prefer YouTube over outdoor hobbies because going out for physical activities often requires time, commitment, and coordination with others, which can be challenging. YouTube offers a flexible way to relax and have fun without those commitments, making it my favorite hobby.

Here's a revised, clearer version:

Over the past two decades, technology has transformed the world. It has become a powerful tool for communication, connecting people instantly across the globe. With just a click, we can now send text messages, voice messages, and have video conversations. This shift has had a significant impact on my life, too. Growing up in a village, I remember when we had to travel long distances to communicate important messages because mobile phones were rare. Conveying messages was challenging and time-consuming.

However, with the widespread adoption of mobile phones—and now smartphones—communication has become effortless. These devices have become essential in our lives. Technology, especially social media platforms like Facebook, Instagram, and WhatsApp, has created new ways to connect. But there are some downsides. Many people become absorbed in the endless scroll on social media, spending hours or even days on their phones, often with little benefit. It has become a source of amusement and, for some, an addiction, detaching them from the real world.

Another effect of technology is on younger generations, who often prefer video games with captivating graphics over outdoor physical activities. Many spend hours gaming instead of engaging in sports or outdoor play. This immersion in digital content is alluring, but it can sometimes disconnect people from the real world. To address these issues, we should consider proper regulations and tools to help people find a balance.

In short, technology has revolutionized the world with many positive effects on society, though it also has a few drawbacks that could be managed with careful oversight.

As for my favorite piece of technology, it's definitely my computer. I spend a lot of time on it, and it's incredibly versatile. I have a 25-inch LED monitor with a mechanical keyboard and mouse, which makes working on it enjoyable. With headphones on, I can stay productive, communicate with anyone, and even listen to background music. My computer is also a great resource for learning, as I have access to e-books, video content, and other valuable materials. This setup makes my computer my favorite device, as it fuels my curiosity and supports my love for learning.

Here's a polished and structured version:

The place I visited one year ago was Murree, a beautiful mountain area in Pakistan. Murree is famous for its stunning mountainous landscapes, with enormous peaks and breathtaking views. In Urdu, we call these mountains pahars, and they truly make the region a remarkable place to visit. This was my first experience in a mountainous area, so every moment was thrilling and memorable for me. I had never even imagined what mountain scenery could look like in real life, so it was a new and unforgettable experience.

I went with a friend, and we spent over five days exploring Murree. We visited several famous sites and enjoyed a variety of exciting activities like skydiving, snowboarding, and gliding. The area is quite cold, which attracts many visitors from all over Pakistan. I noticed that some people even have houses in this region, which looked stunning both from a distance and up close. Standing in those mountain homes and looking out over the vast, rugged landscape was an amazing feeling.

This experience left a lasting impact on me. Many times since, I've wished I could go back, and I've even dreamed of one day owning a house in Murree. The natural beauty, the unique lifestyle of mountain living, and the incredible views have made Murree my favorite place to visit.

If I had to choose a country to visit, it would be the United States. The USA is known as a land of opportunities, and I believe it could provide the environment and resources to help me achieve my career dreams. The U.S. is a hub for many fields that align with my interests and ambitions, offering a different environment and unique opportunities not found in my own country or other places.

Moreover, the culture, diverse communities, and global influence of the United States are very appealing to me. The U.S. has a profound impact on the world, and experiencing that firsthand would be exciting. These factors make the United States my top dream destination.

Here's a clearer, more polished version:

The person who has inspired me the most is Imran Khan, a prominent political leader in Pakistan who served as Prime Minister for 3.5 years. Before his political career, Imran Khan was an exceptional cricketer and led Pakistan to victory in the 1992 Cricket World Cup. What impresses me most about him is his determination and his ability to fight until the end, no matter the odds.

Although he didn't come from an elite family, Imran Khan worked incredibly hard from a young age. When he was selected as the captain of Pakistan's national cricket team, the team faced several challenges, particularly during the 1992 World Cup. Pakistan started poorly, losing five consecutive matches, which seemed to eliminate their chances. However, Imran Khan's leadership and belief in the team never wavered. He inspired the team with his confidence and determination, declaring that they would go on to win the tournament. Remarkably, his optimism became reality, and Pakistan went on to win the World Cup, marking a historic achievement for the country.

After retiring from cricket, Imran Khan could have enjoyed a comfortable life, as he was well-respected internationally, had served as a chancellor for international universities, and was even married to the daughter of a well-known British figure. But he chose to return to Pakistan and serve his nation, beginning a political career that would prove extremely challenging. For 22 years, he struggled to establish himself as a third-party leader in a political system dominated by two major parties. Despite the lack of initial support and continuous setbacks, he remained determined and finally became the Prime Minister of Pakistan after over two decades of relentless effort.

I admire Imran Khan for his resilience, strong determination, and his unwavering commitment to his goals. His journey is incredibly inspiring to me because it shows how far one can go with perseverance and a fighting spirit. His life has taught me the value of determination and the importance of standing by one's principles.

Here's a clearer and more structured version:

I cannot deny the importance of friendship, which has a significant influence on a person's life. Friendships have also been invaluable for me, especially during challenging times, when my friends provided much-needed support. Friendship is an essential way to become more socialized, which I believe is crucial; without some socialization, life can feel isolating and difficult. Having friends strengthens your communication skills, analytical thinking, and reasoning abilities. Spending time with friends builds resilience and helps us navigate life's challenges.

Although my family has always been supportive, and I haven't faced major difficulties that required me to lean on friends, there were moments in my childhood when friends were my primary source of support. This was especially true when I was living with relatives, away from my immediate family. My friends helped me through that period, and I was grateful for them. Now, with my family close by, I don't often need help from friends, but I'm always there for them when they face difficulties.

I also believe that healthy friendships require boundaries and respect for privacy. In today's world, privacy in friendships can sometimes be overlooked. While I do believe in the idea of "friends with benefits"—friends who mutually support each other in practical ways—I also value friendships that offer emotional support in tough times. After family, I think friendships are among the most supportive and meaningful connections a person can have, and they should have a positive influence on one's life.

Throughout my school years, I was a friendly and social person, making many friends. I've always enjoyed spending time with them, learning from them, and sharing experiences. Friendships are a great source of joy and growth, and without them, life can feel dull and lonely. Friends allow us to share emotions, thoughts, and personal challenges that may feel too personal to discuss with family.

It's important, however, to choose friends wisely. Surround yourself with people who are supportive, passionate, and aligned with your values and goals. That way, friendships can be truly amazing, helping you grow and feel understood.

One historical figure I deeply admire is Imran Khan. He has had a remarkable journey, both as a cricketer and as a political leader. His life story is inspiring for several reasons, particularly his determination, resilience, and commitment to making a difference for his country.

Imran Khan first became a household name as a cricketer. He led Pakistan to victory in the 1992 Cricket World Cup, an achievement that not only brought glory to Pakistan but also showcased his leadership and vision. What makes his achievement even more remarkable is the fact that, despite initial setbacks and losses during the tournament, Imran Khan's unwavering belief in his team's potential turned the tide. His ability to motivate his players and remain focused on the ultimate goal in the face of adversity is something that continues to inspire people around the world.

After retiring from cricket, Imran Khan could have easily enjoyed a life of luxury, as he had already earned international recognition. However, he chose to turn his attention to politics, driven by a desire to improve the lives of his fellow Pakistanis. His decision to enter politics was not an easy one, especially considering the political landscape in Pakistan, which has long been dominated by a few established parties. For over two decades, Imran Khan struggled to build support for his political party, facing rejection and setbacks. Yet, he never gave up on his dream of bringing change to Pakistan.

In 2018, after 22 years of relentless effort, he finally became the Prime Minister of Pakistan. What is most inspiring about Imran Khan's political journey is his resilience and his unwavering commitment to his principles. He never compromised on his vision for a corruption-free, just society, despite facing immense challenges. His political career, though controversial at times, has been focused on addressing the issues of poverty, corruption, and inequality in Pakistan.

What I find most inspiring about Imran Khan is not just his accomplishments in cricket or politics, but his character. He has shown immense perseverance and the ability to face hardships head-on. His story teaches us the importance of persistence, the value of believing in one's vision, and the power of hard work. Imran Khan's life is a testament to the fact that with determination and a clear purpose, one can overcome any challenge and create meaningful change.

Here is a more polished and structured version of your response:

The environmental concern that I find most alarming is air pollution, specifically the air quality index (AQI). I currently live in Lahore, which has been ranked as one of the most polluted cities in the world. At its worst, the AQI in Lahore has reached hazardous levels of around 900, whereas New Delhi, another highly polluted city, had an AQI of around 200. To put it into perspective, an AQI between 0 and 50 is considered good, but anything beyond 50 becomes progressively worse, with 900 being extremely hazardous.

Living in such a polluted environment has posed significant health challenges for me, as I suffer from asthma. From a young age, I experienced allergic reactions due to the poor air quality. I have struggled with breathing issues, sore throats, nasal problems, and various ENT (ear, nose, and throat) complications. This has been a serious concern for me, as well as for many others in Lahore, especially those with respiratory issues.

To address this problem, there are several actions we can take both individually and collectively to improve air quality. On an individual level, we can reduce pollution by using public transport instead of private vehicles. This would help reduce traffic emissions and lessen the overall pollution caused by cars. Additionally, we can contribute by recycling waste and avoiding the excessive use of natural resources. It is also important to reduce noise pollution and support environmental awareness campaigns, such as those encouraging tree planting in urban areas. Growing trees helps absorb pollutants and improves air quality.

On a larger scale, governments have a significant role to play in tackling air pollution. They can implement and enforce stricter environmental regulations, especially for industries that produce harmful emissions. For example, factories should be required to minimize chemical discharges into the air. Governments can also invest in and promote public transportation systems that are environmentally friendly, such as electric buses or trains. Furthermore, they can create and enforce policies that encourage the use of renewable energy sources and reduce reliance on fossil fuels.

In conclusion, both individual actions and government policies are essential in improving air quality and addressing environmental issues. While we can make a difference through our own efforts, strong regulations and initiatives from the government are needed to create a lasting impact. Thank you.

One of the most important cultural customs in Pakistan is Eid-ul-Fitr, a significant religious festival that marks the end of Ramadan, the holy month of fasting for Muslims. This festival is celebrated with great enthusiasm and joy across the country, and it holds deep religious, cultural, and social significance.

Eid-ul-Fitr is a time of thanksgiving to Allah for the strength to complete the fast and for His blessings. During Ramadan, Muslims fast from dawn until sunset, abstaining from food, drink, and other physical needs as a way of purifying the soul and developing self-discipline. The end of this spiritual journey is celebrated with Eid-ul-Fitr, which is also known as the "Festival of Breaking the Fast."

The celebration begins with a special prayer (Salat al-Eid) performed in large open spaces or mosques, where thousands of people gather. This prayer is often followed by a sermon, and it is a time for the community to come together and reflect on the blessings of Ramadan. After the prayer, people greet each other with the phrase Eid Mubarak (Happy Eid), and it is a time of family reunions, visiting friends, and sharing meals.

One of the key traditions during Eid-ul-Fitr is the giving of Zakat al-Fitr, a form of charity that is given before the Eid prayer to help those in need. This charity ensures that everyone, including the less fortunate, can join in the celebrations. It is an act of kindness and compassion, which strengthens the bonds of community.

The customs associated with Eid-ul-Fitr are both joyful and social. People wear new clothes, often traditional attire such as shalwar kameez for men and women, and enjoy festive meals with family and friends. Special foods such as sewaiyyan (sweet vermicelli), biryani, nihari, and various sweets are prepared and shared. The exchange of gifts, particularly money for children, is also a common tradition during this time.

Eid is not just a religious event, but also a cultural one, as it brings people together, transcending regional, ethnic, and social differences. The festive atmosphere is felt everywhere – from bustling markets to quiet homes – as families celebrate the end of the fasting period and embrace the spirit of generosity, unity, and joy.

In summary, Eid-ul-Fitr is one of the most significant cultural and religious traditions in Pakistan. It is celebrated with prayers, feasts, charity, and the company of loved ones, highlighting values such as gratitude, generosity, and community. It is a time when the entire country comes together, irrespective of differences, to celebrate the blessings of life and faith.

My favorite holiday is Eid-ul-Fitr, which is celebrated at the end of Ramadan, the holy month of fasting in Islam. This holiday is significant not only because it marks the end of a month of spiritual reflection and self-discipline but also because it is a time of celebration, gratitude, and togetherness. It is a time when family and friends come together to share meals, exchange gifts, and express love and gratitude for the blessings they have received.

The way my family celebrates Eid-ul-Fitr is a mixture of religious observance and joyous traditions. The celebration begins early in the morning with the Eid prayer, which is performed in congregation at mosques or large open spaces. We usually gather with our relatives and community members, and after the prayer, everyone greets each other with Eid Mubarak (Happy Eid), exchanging warm wishes and prayers for prosperity and peace.

At home, the celebration continues with a special breakfast, often featuring sweet dishes like sewaiyyan (sweet vermicelli) and other homemade treats. After that, we visit relatives and neighbors, share meals, and enjoy each other's company. One of the most cherished aspects of Eid in my family is the tradition of giving Eidi (a gift, usually money, given to children), which is a fun and much-anticipated part of the day. The children look forward to receiving Eidi, and it's a way for elders to show affection and blessings.

A special tradition in our family is preparing and sharing a big feast, which includes dishes like biryani, nihari, chapli kebabs, and various sweets like gulab jamun and barfi. Everyone takes part in cooking or bringing a dish to the table, and the meal is often enjoyed late into the afternoon. The whole atmosphere is filled with joy, laughter, and gratitude, as we all gather to celebrate the completion of Ramadan and the start of Eid.

Another important part of our Eid celebrations is giving Zakat al-Fitr, a charity given to the less fortunate before the Eid prayer, so everyone can join in the festivities. It's a tradition in our family to make sure that we help those in need during this time, which reminds us of the true spirit of Eid—compassion, generosity, and community.

In summary, Eid-ul-Fitr is my favorite holiday because of its combination of spiritual significance and joyful celebrations. It's a time when family comes together, old traditions are upheld, and new memories are made. The love, the food, the laughter, and the sense of togetherness make it a holiday I look forward to every year.

One of my favorite foods is Beef Pulao, a traditional dish in Pakistan that is not only delicious but also holds a special place in my heart. Beef Pulao is a rice dish where small pieces of tender beef are cooked with fragrant rice and a variety of spices like cumin, cinnamon, cloves, and cardamom. The beef is slow-cooked until it becomes soft and flavorful, and the rice absorbs all the spices and the rich beef flavor.

What makes Beef Pulao special for me is the combination of tender beef pieces in every bite of rice. I am a big fan of beef, and I love how every spoonful has a piece of beef mixed in with the perfectly cooked rice. It's the perfect balance of flavors – the spices give it a wonderful aroma, and the beef adds a hearty, rich taste. I am not a vegetarian, so the chance to eat beef in my meal always makes me happy, and Beef Pulao offers just that.

This dish connects to my culture in many ways. In Pakistan, rice dishes like Pulao are common in many households, especially during gatherings or special occasions. It's often prepared for family meals or when guests are over. I have many fond memories of sitting with my family and sharing a big plate of Beef Pulao, especially during Eid or weddings, when the whole family comes together.

For me, Beef Pulao is more than just food – it's a dish that represents warmth, togetherness, and the rich culinary traditions of Pakistan. Every time I eat it, I remember those family moments, and it makes the meal even more enjoyable.

I am currently learning to become an AI engineer, and I am passionate about this field because it is revolutionizing the world. To become a great AI engineer, I started by learning Python, which is a fundamental programming language in AI. I also had to understand various computer science concepts, which were initially challenging for me, especially as I came from a mathematics background. Over time, I built my knowledge and started learning the mathematics behind machine learning and AI, especially in areas like algorithms, linear algebra, and statistics.

The reason I chose AI as a career is because of its vast potential. AI is not only transforming industries but is expected to be a trillion-dollar market, changing how businesses and decisions are made. Technologies like ChatGPT, voice assistants, image generation, and more are just the beginning of the AI revolution. Seeing how AI is being integrated into everything from customer service to healthcare, I am excited to be part of this change.

I am still in the learning phase, and although I have learned a lot, there is still much more to explore. My goal is to build a strong foundation in AI and machine learning so that I can eventually work in this field. One of the reasons I am also looking at opportunities in the United States is because it is a global leader in AI development, with many opportunities for growth and innovation in this field. I believe being in the U.S. will provide me with the right exposure and resources to further my career.

I have a master's degree in mathematics, and now I want to apply those skills in AI and machine learning. AI and mathematics go hand in hand, and I am excited to use my mathematical background to solve real-world problems with AI. Being part of this technological revolution is what motivates me, and I am determined to contribute to it. I look forward to learning more and one day having a career in AI, whether in the industry or academia.

My biggest accomplishment is being educated despite coming from a backward area of the country and a village where education is rare. I am the only person from my entire neighborhood who has pursued a master's degree, and I am also the first in my village to continue studying after high school. This, for me, is a significant achievement.

I faced many challenges on this journey. In my village, most people encouraged me to quit my education and work in the fields, with animals, or other similar jobs. There was no one who could help me or provide guidance. Everyone was focused on their own struggles and didn't see education as a solution. They constantly told me to follow the same path they had taken, but I remained determined to continue my studies.

To pursue my education, I had to live away from my family, in the city, to escape the negative comments and pressure from my village. Financial support was another huge challenge, as education, especially at the college and university levels, is expensive. My family faced a lot of difficulties in covering the costs, and at times, they had to dip into their savings to help me. Despite their struggles, they encouraged me to continue my education, even when the pressure to stop and work was immense. In our society, many families consider earning just a small amount per day to be enough for their survival, so education is often seen as less important. This made my journey even harder.

However, I fought through these challenges, and now I consider my education to be one of my greatest accomplishments. It was a battle not only against the difficulties of life but also against the mindset in my community. My goal now is to provide basic education to others in my village. There are many talented students who are unable to continue their education after school because of their environment and financial constraints. Families often prioritize immediate income over long-term education because they can't see the benefits of education in the short term.

I aim to change this mentality and provide the support needed to create an environment where children in my village can pursue education. I believe that with the right opportunities, there are many students who will succeed and bring positive change to their families and community. This is what I want to achieve in the future—ensuring that others in my village, like me, have the chance to pursue education and break free from the cycle of poverty.

A time when I had to make a very difficult decision was right after high school, when I had to choose a subject to study for my bachelor's degree. This decision was especially tough because I didn't have a clear passion for any specific field, and, as a first-generation college student from a village where no one had studied beyond high school, there was no one to guide me.

The main challenge at that point was simply to pursue education itself, more than worrying about which subject to choose. I knew that continuing my education was crucial, but my limited financial resources made things even harder. I had two options: a two-year degree program, which was more affordable but not as valuable internationally, or a four-year bachelor's program, which would provide better recognition and career options. Despite wanting the four-year program, I had to choose the two-year option due to financial constraints.

When it came to choosing my subject, I was really torn. I considered English, which I enjoyed, but also knew that mathematics might open more career opportunities. In the end, I chose mathematics, thinking that I could continue to improve my English later, but mathematics might be harder to learn at an older age. This decision wasn't easy, but I stuck with it, ultimately completing my master's in mathematics as well.

Looking back, I'm proud of the choices I made despite the challenges. Over time, I realized my interest in computer science, and now I'm transitioning into that field. My journey hasn't been straightforward, but each step has helped me develop skills and resilience. This experience taught me that even tough choices can lead to growth, and that passion sometimes emerges as you keep pushing forward.

One of my most cherished childhood memories is from when I was in grades 4 and 5. I remember asking my parents to buy me a bicycle, which was a big request at the time because we lived in a small village where poverty was a big challenge, and hardly anyone could afford to buy new cycles for their kids. But to my amazement, my parents agreed and bought me a brand new cycle. I was overjoyed! It felt like a huge moment—not only because I had my own cycle but because I was the only one in the entire village with a new one.

This cycle became a source of happiness not only for me but for my friends as well. I would let them ride it, and together we would go exploring, making our own little adventures. We would cycle down a narrow road that led to a mango orchard, and in the winter, we'd take another path to an orange grove. There was also a road that led to a big canal, and that became one of our favorite places to visit.

Every day after school, around 2 PM, my friends and I would set off on the cycle, spending hours riding around, laughing, and discovering new things. Homework was light back then, so we had plenty of time to enjoy. That bike was more than just a cycle—it was a ticket to freedom, friendship, and endless fun. Those afternoons filled with cycling and laughter will always hold a special place in my heart.

Using public transportation and driving a personal car both have their advantages and disadvantages, especially for daily commuting.

Advantages of Public Transportation:

1. Cost-Effective: Public transport like buses or the Metro is much cheaper than owning and maintaining a car. You save on petrol, maintenance, and parking fees.
2. Less Traffic and Pollution: Public transport helps reduce traffic on the roads and lowers air pollution, which is especially helpful in cities like Lahore and Karachi where pollution is a big problem.
3. No Parking Hassles: With public transportation, you don't need to worry about finding parking, which can be difficult and expensive in crowded areas.
4. Time for Other Activities: On buses or trains, you can relax, read, or use your phone instead of focusing on driving.

Disadvantages of Public Transportation:

1. Crowding and Comfort: Public transport can be very crowded, especially during rush hours, which can make it uncomfortable.
2. Limited Routes and Timings: Public transportation doesn't always go to every area, and timings can be irregular or delayed, which can make commuting difficult for some people.
3. Safety Concerns: In some areas, public transport may not feel safe, especially for women or during nighttime.

Advantages of Driving a Personal Car:

1. Convenience and Privacy: With your own car, you have the freedom to travel whenever and wherever you want. You don't have to rely on others and have complete privacy.
2. Comfort: Driving your own car is often more comfortable, as you have your own space and control over the environment, like air conditioning and music.
3. Flexible for Families: If you have a family, it's easier to manage kids or carry groceries in a personal car compared to public transport.

Disadvantages of Driving a Personal Car:

1. Expensive: Owning a car is costly, with expenses like fuel, maintenance, registration, and parking fees.
2. Traffic and Pollution: More cars on the road mean more traffic jams and pollution, which affects everyone's health.
3. Parking Issues: Finding parking in busy areas can be stressful and time-consuming, especially in big cities.

In Pakistan, the choice between public transport and personal cars depends on individual needs and the city you live in. Public transport is affordable and eco-friendly, while personal cars offer more comfort and flexibility.

Book: "Think and Grow Rich" by Napoleon Hill

The book Think and Grow Rich by Napoleon Hill had a profound impact on me. It is one of the most famous self-help books, and its core message revolves around the power of positive thinking and the importance of having a clear goal in life. Napoleon Hill interviewed successful people like Andrew Carnegie, Thomas Edison, and Henry Ford to discover the secrets behind their success. This book outlines 13 principles that anyone can apply to achieve success, including the power of desire, faith, and persistence.

What I found most inspiring about Think and Grow Rich is how it teaches that success is not just about hard work but about having the right mindset. The idea that our thoughts shape our reality and that if we focus on our goals with faith and determination, we can achieve them, was revolutionary for me. I always believed that hard work was enough, but Hill's book made me realize that having a positive attitude and a clear plan is just as important.

One of the most impactful lessons from the book is the concept of "Definiteness of Purpose." Hill explains that success comes when you have a clear, specific goal in mind. This resonated with me because I realized that in my life, I was sometimes unsure of what I really wanted. The book helped me focus on what I wanted to achieve, and it motivated me to take the necessary steps to reach my goals.

Think and Grow Rich also emphasizes the power of the "Master Mind," which refers to the idea of surrounding yourself with like-minded people who can support and encourage you. This taught me the importance of building a strong network of friends, mentors, and peers who share similar goals. It also highlighted the need to learn from others and stay open to new ideas.

Reading this book made me feel more empowered. It gave me a sense of control over my life, and I started thinking more positively about my future. I also understood the importance of persistence. Hill talks about how many people give up just before they are about to succeed, and this really struck a chord with me. It taught me to never give up on my dreams, no matter how tough things might get.

Movie: "3 Idiots"

The movie 3 Idiots made a significant emotional impact on me. It's a Bollywood movie that explores the pressures of the educational system in India and Pakistan, focusing on how it affects students' mental health and their personal development. The movie follows three engineering students who are trying to navigate the difficult and competitive world of college education. The film is full of humor, drama, and life lessons.

The central theme of 3 Idiots is the importance of pursuing one's passion and not just chasing degrees or societal approval. The movie challenges the idea that success is measured by grades and marks. It teaches that true success comes when you do what you love, and you will naturally excel in it. This message was really powerful for me because, like many others, I've often felt pressure to choose a career path based on what society expects, rather than what I truly enjoy.

The story of Rancho, Farhan, and Raju—three friends who are trying to cope with the rigid education system—moved me deeply. Farhan is forced by his father to pursue engineering, even though his heart is in wildlife photography. Raju, on the other hand, is struggling with a lack of confidence, while Rancho is the free spirit who challenges the norms. The movie is full of funny and emotional moments that made me laugh and cry. One of the most touching scenes was when Rancho gave a speech to a crowd of students, urging them to "follow excellence, and success will follow."

What made the movie even more special was its ability to break down the serious topic of education and mental health with humor and lightness. It taught me that life is about balance—pursuing your dreams while also facing challenges. The movie also made me realize how important it is to support others, to help them find their own path in life, and to be there when they need encouragement. The idea that "All is well" became a life lesson for me—it reminded me that no matter how difficult things get, everything will eventually work out if you keep a positive attitude.

After watching 3 Idiots, I started thinking about my own educational journey and the pressures I have faced. It helped me see that it's okay to struggle, and that it's okay to not have everything figured out. The movie made me realize that what matters most is staying true to yourself and following your passion, no matter what others say.

Show: "Udaari"

In Pakistan, one of the shows that had a significant impact on me is Udaari. It was a drama series that aired on Hum TV, and it dealt with very serious and sensitive issues like child abuse, the empowerment of women, and social injustices in Pakistani society. Udaari is a beautiful, thought-provoking drama that made me think about the realities many people, especially women and children, face in our society.

The show's story revolves around the lives of two young girls, one of whom is a victim of sexual abuse. It portrays how difficult it is for victims to speak up, and how they are often silenced by societal norms and shame. The show also focuses on the role of women in Pakistani society and how they struggle to achieve independence and self-worth. What made Udaari especially impactful was how it raised awareness about child abuse, a topic that is often hidden under the carpet in Pakistani culture.

Watching Udaari made me realize the importance of speaking up against injustices and standing up for those who are unable to do so themselves. The show evoked a mix of emotions—anger, sadness, and a strong sense of responsibility to contribute to change. It also made me reflect on how our society often neglects these issues and how important it is to educate people about the rights of children and women.

One of the most powerful aspects of Udaari was the portrayal of strong, independent female characters who refused to be silenced. The character of Meera, in particular, stood out to me as a symbol of strength. Despite facing unimaginable hardships, she continued to fight for her dignity and the well-being of her children. This character inspired me to be more vocal about issues that matter and to stand up for what is right.

Udaari left me with a feeling of urgency—an understanding that we cannot ignore the problems in our society and that each of us has a responsibility to make a difference, no matter how small. It reminded me of the importance of being compassionate and empathetic toward others, especially the marginalized and vulnerable in our society.

Conclusion

All of these books, movies, and shows—Think and Grow Rich, 3 Idiots, and Udaari—have had a profound effect on my life. Think and Grow Rich taught me the importance of having a positive mindset and a clear goal in life. 3 Idiots made me realize that success is not just about grades but about following one's passion. And Udaari opened my eyes to the harsh realities of child abuse and gender inequality, inspiring me to contribute to change in my own way.

Each of these pieces of work evoked a range of emotions—empowerment, motivation, sadness, and hope—and together, they have shaped the way I view the world and the kind of person I want to become. They've inspired me to always strive for personal growth, to pursue my dreams with passion, and to be more aware of the social issues around me.

My Favorite Kind of Music

My favorite kind of music is qawwali, a traditional form of Sufi devotional music that originated in South Asia, especially Pakistan and India. The main reason I enjoy qawwali is because of the emotional depth and spiritual connection it offers. The rhythmic beats, soulful melodies, and the powerful, expressive voices of the qawwali singers create an atmosphere that feels both calming and uplifting at the same time.

When I listen to qawwali, I feel a sense of peace and tranquility. The music connects me to something greater than myself, and I often feel spiritually awakened. Songs like "Tajdar-e-Haram" or "Bhar Do Jholi Meri" by the famous qawwali singer, Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, can stir deep emotions. I find myself reflecting on life, love, and the divine. The intricate harmonies and the energy of the music help me clear my mind and find comfort, especially during difficult or stressful times.

In addition to the emotional connection, qawwali is also a reminder of our rich cultural heritage. It brings me closer to the traditions of my ancestors and reminds me of the power of music to unite people. The call-and-response style of qawwali, where the lead singer sings and the chorus responds, creates a sense of unity and community. Overall, listening to qawwali is a way for me to feel connected to my roots, find inner peace, and reflect on the deeper aspects of life.

My Favorite Type of Weather

My favorite type of weather is the cool, breezy weather during the autumn season. In Pakistan, we get beautiful autumn weather, especially in areas like Murree and northern regions, where the air is crisp and fresh. I enjoy this kind of weather because it has a calming effect on my mood. The gentle breeze, the clear skies, and the mild temperature make me feel energized and at peace.

When the weather is cool, I feel more productive and motivated. It's the perfect weather for outdoor activities, like walking or hiking, and it encourages me to spend more time outside. I enjoy sitting under a tree, reading a book, or just enjoying the natural beauty around me. The change in season also symbolizes a fresh start, making me feel rejuvenated and hopeful. I find that during this weather, I'm more focused on my work and more creative in my thinking.

Additionally, the cool weather is great for spending time with family and friends. I love having tea or coffee with them, chatting about life, or just enjoying each other's company. The cool breeze also brings back fond memories of family gatherings and the simple joys of life. Overall, the autumn weather makes me feel calm, refreshed, and happy, and it positively impacts both my mood and my daily activities.

An Animal I Find Fascinating

One animal that I find truly fascinating is the eagle. Eagles are powerful and majestic birds of prey, and I am captivated by their strength, grace, and incredible ability to soar through the sky. What I find most interesting about eagles is their keen eyesight. They can see up to 8 times better than humans, which allows them to spot prey from great distances. This ability is both awe-inspiring and humbling, and it makes me appreciate the natural world even more.

Another fascinating thing about eagles is their hunting technique. They are skilled hunters, often flying high above the ground, scanning the terrain for food. Once they spot their prey, they swoop down with incredible speed and precision to capture it. This skill requires strength, agility, and intelligence, and it shows how well-adapted eagles are to their environment.

What I also admire about eagles is their sense of freedom. They are known for their solitary nature and their ability to navigate vast expanses of sky without being tethered to the ground. Watching an eagle soar high above the earth, effortlessly gliding on air currents, gives me a sense of liberation and reminds me of the importance of independence.

Finally, the symbolism of the eagle is also meaningful to me. In many cultures, the eagle represents power, freedom, and vision, and I find these qualities inspiring. The eagle's presence in the wild is a reminder of the beauty and strength that exists in nature, and it motivates me to pursue my own goals with determination and clarity.

Each of these topics – music, weather, and animals – adds a unique and special layer to my daily life and experiences. Whether it's the peacefulness and spiritual depth of qawwali, the refreshing cool autumn air, or the awe-inspiring strength of an eagle, they all help shape how I see and feel about the world around me.

A typical day in my life starts early in the morning. I usually wake up around 6:00 AM to begin my day. The first thing I do is pray Fajr, the early morning prayer, which is an important part of my daily routine. After prayer, I spend a few moments in quiet reflection, preparing myself mentally for the day ahead.

Once I'm up, I usually take a shower and get dressed. If it's a weekday, I have breakfast, which is typically something light like tea or a paratha with yogurt. After breakfast, I gather my things, including my laptop and study materials, as I have a busy day of learning and work ahead.

I spend most of my day either studying or working on different tasks related to my goal of becoming an AI engineer. Right now, I'm learning more about programming and AI models, which involves reading books, watching tutorials, and practicing coding. I focus a lot on Python programming and machine learning algorithms. This work can be challenging, but I enjoy it because it feels like I'm building the skills I need for a successful future.

Around mid-morning, I take a short break to stretch and clear my mind. Sometimes I go for a walk around the neighborhood, especially if the weather is nice. This gives me a chance to get some fresh air and reset before diving back into my studies.

In the afternoon, I continue my learning, but I also spend time doing other tasks like researching new AI trends, reading articles, or working on projects related to machine learning. Sometimes I have virtual meetings or discussions with fellow students or colleagues where we talk about the latest developments in the field.

Lunchtime comes around, and I usually take a break to have something light, like rice with vegetables or a simple sandwich. During lunch, I also take some time to relax and maybe watch a short video or listen to music.

After lunch, I often do some light household chores, like helping my family with tasks such as cleaning or running errands. I believe it's important to balance work and personal responsibilities, and this also gives me a chance to connect with my family.

In the evening, I like to unwind by either reading a book or catching up on the news. I also spend some time with my friends or family, either in person or through a phone call. Socializing with them is a great way to relax and keep my mind at ease after a busy day.

Before going to bed, I pray Isha, the night prayer, and spend some time in quiet reflection. I think about my goals and how I can improve the next day. I also make sure to plan for the next day, setting tasks and goals I want to accomplish.

Finally, I go to sleep around 11:00 PM so that I'm well-rested for the next day.

Overall, my day is a mix of studying, work, family time, and self-care. I try to maintain a balance between my goals and responsibilities while also taking care of my physical and mental well-being.
